The bottled 2015 Côtes du Jura Ouillé delivers all the unbottled wine promised, and perhaps a bit more after one and a half years in bottle. Even the topped-up wines without flor have a nutty twist and a hint of curry that is really subtle here. The wine shows the concentration and power of the year combined with great purity and very clean aromas. As often happens with subtle wines, it has gained complexity, detail and depth over time. It's very drinkable now, but I do not discard the possibility that it might continue improving, because for sure it's going to live in bottle for at least a decade. The label does not read Ouillé, but it's a different label, a drawing of two people made by a kid. (LG)
